SYNOPSIS.

John Enderby, a squire of Lincolnshire, is offered a knighthood by King Charles the First, while the latter is in the midst of his business. Enderby refuses the honor, on the ground that he cannot afford to pay the fee contingent on its acceptance. The king is very angry, as the fee is the only thing involved, and is encouraged in his displeasure by Lord Rippindale, an old enemy of Enderby's. Enderby persists in his refusal, and the king thereupon confiscates his estate and the wayward Enderby is warned by a still-walker of the fens to keep away from the king that night. Enderby suspects a plot against the king, and, set on by a still-walker, in time to rescue the king and Lord Rippindale from a band of thieves who have tracked their party, Enderby rides away. The king, although mollified by Enderby's gallantry, declares that the knighthood must be accepted, and that then he will make Enderby a baron. Enderby, however, Enderby House and describes his experience to his daughter, Mistress Felicity. She supports him in his position, but his son, Garrett Enderby, while avowing loyalty to his father, expresses dissatisfaction at the refusal of the barony. Soon Lord Rippindale arrives with the king's troops and sends in Sir John Mowbray, a young knight, feeling Enderby's daughter, urges him for her sake to accept the king's ultimatum. Enderby refuses both Mowbray and Rippindale, and the latter prepares to storm the house. Garrett Enderby displays a flag of truce, and his father, overwhelmed at his son's disloyalty, surrenders. All are placed under arrest, but Sir John Mowbray privately aids Enderby and Felicity to escape. Garrett is knighted by the king. The father and daughter go to Holland. When Cromwell comes into power he sends for Enderby, of whom he has heard, and offers him duties in the foreign service. He sends Enderby to his estate, where Enderby finds Garrett, who has been expelled by Cromwell's soldiers, but has returned on hearing of his father's arrival. They quarrel, and the son strikes his father with the flat of his sword. Cromwell's soldiers arrest Garrett. The soldiers are killed or desert, and there are no witnesses against Enderby, but his father, the latter is called upon by Cromwell to testify against his son, but refuses, and is therefore a second time banished from England. Ten years later, when Charles the king happens upon Felicity, now serving the queen under the name of Palkingham, as she is reading an account of John Enderby's misfortune to the queen. He is much interested. He asks if this is Sir Garrett Enderby, but is told that Garrett has died and that it is his father. He asks for the whole story.

stole a glance at the young chronicler as he went. She saw him, then recognized him, and flushed scarlet. She did not dare, however, to let him come to her. He understood, and he went his way after the king and Lord Rippindale.

In all the years that had passed since the night he had helped her father and herself to escape from Enderby House, since he added them to leave this hiding place on the coast and escape to Holland, she had never forgotten his last words to her, the laughing look of his eyes, the pressure of his hand.

Many a time since she had been in her own mind though of him as she had heard her father call him, "Happy Dick Mowbray!" and the remembrance of his joyous face had been a help to her in all her sufferings. His brown hair was now streaked with gray, but the light in the face was the same; there was the same alertness and buoyant health in the figure and the same row of laughing white teeth.

As she stood watching the departing figure she scarcely knew that the queen was preparing to go to her bed-chamber. She became aware of it definitely by the voice of her majesty, now somewhat petulant.

Two hours later she was walking alone in one of the galleries when, hearing a gentle step behind her, she turned and saw the king. She made an obeisance and was about to move on, but he stopped her, speaking kindly to her, and thanking her for the great pleasure she had given him that afternoon.

"What should be done for this quasi knight of Enderby?" asked the king.

"He saved the life of the king," she said; then boldly, confidently, "he saved the life of the king, and he lost all that can repay him for his dis-honored years and his ruined home."

"What think you, mistress, should be done with him? Speak freely of the man whom the king delighteth to honor."

She felt the sincerity under the indolent courtesy, and spoke as only a woman can speak for those she loves.

"Your majesty, he should have the earldom promised by Wolsey, and his estates restored to him as he left them."

The king laughed dryly.

"He might refuse the large earldom as he scorned the little knighthood."

"If your majesty secured him estates suitable to his rank he could have reason to refuse. He was a solicitous father then for his son—but now!"

Her reply was as diplomatic and suggestive as it was sincere, and Charles loved such talents.

"Upon my soul, dear Mistress Falkingham, I love your cleverness," said the king, "and I will go further."

He stopped and whispered in her ear, and she drew back in fright and anxiety.

"Oh, your majesty, your majesty," she said, "I had not thought—"

She moved on distractedly, but he put out his hand and stayed her.

"Ah, a moment, sweetheart," he said.

"I must go to the queen," she answered, hurriedly. "Oh, your majesty, your majesty!" she repeated. "Would you ruin me?" Her eyes filled with tears. "Until the queen welcomed me here I have had nothing but sorrow. I am friendless and alone."

"No, no," said Charles, kindly, "not alone while Charles is king of England."

"I am little more than an orphan here," she said, "for my father is now only a common soldier, your majesty, and—"

"A common soldier!" repeated Charles a little stiffly; "they told me he was a gentleman of England doing service in Italy."

"My father is in your majesty's household guard," she answered. "He was John Enderby—alas! none would recognize him now as such."

The king stared at her a moment.

"You—you—Mistress—you are John Enderby's daughter?"

Her reply was scarcely above a whisper.

"His only child, your majesty."

"Upon my soul! Upon my soul!" were all Charles said for a moment, and then he added: "Why did you not speak before?"

"My father would not let me, your majesty. He is only returned to England these few months."

"To be near to me, your majesty."

The king bowed low over her hand.

"Mistress Enderby," said he, frankly, "we are honored by your presence in this place. To-morrow morning at eleven your father shall come to us. You are still but a child in face," he said; "and yet—"

"I am twenty-seven years old," she answered frankly.

"Quite old enough to be a countess," he said, charmingly, "and young enough to enjoy the honors thereof."

So saying he bowed again, and with a gracious smile dismissed her. She went so quickly that she did not see as she left the gallery. One of them was Lord Rippindale.

"Ha," said my lord, with a wicked smile, "a new violet in the king's garden!"

His companion turned on him swiftly.

"My lord," said he, "this is the second time to-day you have slandered this lady."

The other lifted his eyebrows.

"Is it a slander to say that the king finds a lady charming at any hour of the clock?" said he.

Sir Richard stamped him across the cheek with his glove.

"Take a pleasant duty from John Enderby's shoulders, my lord! I will meet you at your pleasure!"

The next morning at sunrise Lord Rippindale declared that his late Rippindale's daughter, and he was John Enderby's daughter, and he begged Sir Richard to carry to Enderby an apology for all past wrongs.

Sir Richard came in upon the king at the moment that his majesty was receiving John Enderby, a white-headed old man, yet hale and strong, and wearing the uniform of the king's household guard.

"The king advanced towards him, and said:

"Squire Enderby. You have been absent too long. You will honor us to accept a lady's justice—without a price."

"Your majesty," said Enderby, "for me justice comes too late, but for my child—"

"An earldom can never come too late—"

"For me, your majesty, it comes too late except—"

"Except the house where I was born," Charles looked at him gravely.

"Upon my soul, Enderby," said he, "you are a man to be envied. We will not rob you of your good revenge on our house, nor of your independence. But still we must have our way. Your daughter—if she will not refuse me, she cannot upon the ground that you refused my father—she shall be Countess of Enderby in her own right; with estates in keeping!"

Womanlike, Mistress Felicity had no logical argument against an honor so munificently ordained.

"And now for your estates, who holds them?" asked the king.

"Lord Rippindale, your majesty," answered Enderby.

"Yes, yes, my Lord Haman! We have already sent for him. It is long past the time." His brow darkened.

Sir Richard Mowbray stepped forward and said:

"Your majesty, Lord Rippindale is beyond obedience or reputation!" and then he gave the message of the dead man to John Enderby.

A month later Mowbray was permitted to return to court, and with him came John Enderby and the Countess of Enderby. When Charles was told how matters had gone between the younger two, he gave vent to a mock indignation, and in consequence he made Sir Richard Mowbray an earl also, that, as he said, they might both be at the same nearness to him; for etiquette was tyrannical, and yet he did not know which of them he loved better!

As for the man so long dishonored, Charles swore that since John Enderby came not to the king at court, the king would go to him at Enderby. And go he did in good temper and in great friendship for many a year.
